

The Essay of Dramatic Poesy

Handwritten
N.M.G.

Neander's well-known judgement on Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher

Dryden shows his strength as a judicial critic in his brilliant and penetrating appreciations of Shakespeare, Beaumont and Fletcher and Ben Jonson. On the beginning of the Essay of the Dramatic Poesy he takes up theoretical problems and then defends the variety of English Drama. After that he ~~by~~ through the mouth of Neander takes up the cases of the individual English playwrights and analyses their merits and demerits. By doing this he gives a comparative study on them, especially on Shakespeare and Ben Jonson.

After illustrating the best qualities of English from the works of outstanding English dramatists Neander, symbolising Dryden himself expresses his views on Shakespeare. In the words of Atkins, "Neander's well-known judgement on Shakespeare, to begin with, has since attained classic rank, and this by reason of its keen insight, its suggestive and happy expression." According to Neander Shakespeare was the man of all modern and perhaps ancient poets. He had the largest and most comprehensive soul. All the images of nature were still present to him and he drew them, not laboriously, but luckily. When Shakespeare describes anything, one more than sees it, one feels too. Those who accuse him to have wanted learning, give him the greater commendation: he was naturally learned. He needed not the spectacles of books to read nature. He looked inward and found her there. With born-gifted wisdom and above all philosophy make him, most correct part of intellectual power and imagination, picturesque images, greatest wit. Actually Shakespeare was the Homer, or father of our dramatic poets. But Neander did not say he was everywhere alike. He is many a time flat, insipid; his comic wit degenerates into clutches, his serious things swell into bombast, but he is always great when some great occasion is presented to him. One should do him injury to compare him with the greatest of mankind. No man can say she ever had a fit subject for his wit, and did not then raise himself as high above the rest of poets. The consideration of this made Mr. Hales of Aton say that there was no subject of which any poet ever wrote, but he could produce it much better done in Shakespeare.

On Ben Jonson Dryden has more to say. Through Neander Dryden at some length discusses the merits of Ben Jonson as a dramatist. He regards him as "the most learned and judicious writer which any theatre ever had." He had wit in abundance and was rather frugal of it. He made the drama more artistic. Humour was his proper sphere.
By writing Everyman in His Humour and Everyman out of His Humour he delighted most to represent mechanic people. He was deeply conversant in the ancients, both Greek and Latin and he borrowed boldly from them. In invading what would theft in other poets, is only victory in him. Of Shakespeare was the Homer of elaborate writing, the pattern of finish than that of Shakespeare. But there is an absence of love scenes in Jonson's plays. One seldom finds him making love in any of his scenes or endeavouring to move the passions. Beside this Dryden finds fault with Jonson's style; of these finds fault in his language; it was that he was too too closely and laboriously in his comedies especially. Though he learnedly showed the the language of the classical authors, he did not enough comply with the idiom of English native.

Thus we order the mouthpiece of Jonson makes a comparison between Jonson and Shakespeare. Of Jonson was acknowledged as the more correct poet, Shakespeare the greater with Shakespeare was the more while Jonson was the virgin. Of his comment is most significant of all, however, is Neander's last words on their respective merits, 'Jonson, he declares, 'I admire, but I love Shakespeare; and here judgment is pronounced, not in accord and with rules of technical excellence, but in the light of the general impression and of the emotional appeal to the whole man.'

Appreciation of Beaumont & Fletcher:

Beaumont and Fletcher, Neander feels, had the advantage of Shakespeare's wit and their natural gifts were improved by study. They created generally more polished dramas than Shakespeare's especially those which were made before Beaumont's death.
They understood and imitated the conversa-tion of gentlemen much better. No poet before them could point wild debaucheries and quickness in repartees (or wit) of the then gentlemen as they have done.
Humour which Jonson derived from particular persons, was not made as their business to describe. They represented all the passions very lively and above all with love. The English language in them arrived to its highest perfection. What words have since been taken in, were rather superfluous than ornamental. Beaumont and Fletcher used most of the words orna-mentally. Their plays are not the most pleasant and frequent entertainments of